

The Warner-Carrillo Ranch House was built directly beside the emigrant trail, and figured prominently in the settlers' diaries as their first glimpse of the promised land, the first well-watered valley to be encountered after crossing the great southwestern deserts.